She was actively involved in MoneyLion's diversity efforts and is currently formulating a plan for founding a women's group within the firm, set to launch in June 2019. At her prior role at the Royal Bank of Canada, she co-founded a women's summit for first year female MBA students to boost recruitment of high performing women, resulting in an increase in the number of starting female associates by 200%. Earlier in her career at Goldman Sachs, she instituted a highly popular monthly business education series for women to Board of Directors provide market overviews and financial education for those working in the technology division.

From an early age, volunteering to give back to society was inculcated in Sruthi through her father, who quit his job as an engineer to work full-time at a non-profit seeking to better the lives of the urban poor in Bangalore (India). She volunteered with his organization for several years before co-founding her own non-profit called Genesis during her college years that supplemented thinly staffed public schools with student volunteers that assisted in teaching. Since moving to the United States in 2012, she has volunteered with Habitat for Humanity and New York Cares, and is extremely excited about the opportunity with Women Creating Change to help empower marginalized women and thereby give back to a city that she loves.
